"After I had watched the Army mind at work, disposing of the tank as a useless thing because it could not do exactly what the cavalryman and his horse had always done and in precisely the same way, I was sure the Army would never succeed in choosing a tank that would meet all their requirements until somebody invented tanks that ate hay and thereafter made noises like a horse."

Air Marshall Sir Arthur Harriss, in Bomber Offensive. (This was a comment on his attendance in 1927 of the U. K. Army Staff College.)
